Chapter 15 focuses on evaluating immunological correlates and surrogates of protection. Many new developments in vaccine trial design have been made possible by advances in biological specimen collection, immunology, and genome scans and sequencing of infectious agents. However, a future book on vaccine studies will be the one to cover these in more detail.

Vaccines act to control infectious diseases through multiple mechanisms. Vaccines can reduce susceptibility to infection, progression to symptomatic disease, and the probability that vaccinees will infect others. Vaccines directly protect vaccinees but also provide protection to persons around them by reducing their risk of acquisition.
